Keurig Coffee Maker

Description

This Christmas Santa bought me a Keurig coffee maker. We had been toying with the idea of getting one and he decided we needed one since my husband was growing weary of making the coffee every morning. Yes, Iâ€™m spoiled and I admit it. Iâ€™m not a morning person. We have the B70 model and after running several gallons of water through it and still getting plastic tasting coffee I became increasingly frustrated. I was visiting my parents over the Christmas break and they happened to have one too. Their machine didn't give off a plastic odor or taste and the coffee tasted great. When we got home from our travels my husband called Keurig. They sent us a new machine and we said bon voyage to our old one. I'm grateful this one doesn't have the same plastic smelling odor and the coffee tastes fine. The Keurig home brewing system has been a lesson in trial and error for me. I think I mentioned in a previous post how learning things by trial and error is something that doesn't bring me joy. I'm learning to find the joy in it though by purchasing some different types of coffee and branching out from my usual Dunkin Donuts regular blend. It can get rather expensive at roughly $16 dollars for a box of 24 individual k-cups.   There are tons of different types of coffees, teas, and hot chocolate you can buy. The process of picking out k-cups can be overwhelming. I was going to write this post after I'd sampled more coffees, but thought I'd see if some of my readers could help me with my trial and error process and help me save a few dollars. I know they sell some multi packs, but I prefer a medium roast over the extra bold. I have tried the Dunkin Donuts Hot Chocolate and don't care for it. So far I still like the Dunkin Donuts coffee and my husband likes the Cafe Escapes French Vanilla. I have heard that the Green Mountain Wild Blueberry coffee is good which is next on my list to try. If you have a Keurig, I welcome any suggestions or advice.
